Fellow Arrowmen,

On behalf of the Order of the Arrow and Owasippe Lodge #7 I would like to thank all those who came here tonight to make this banquet a success by celebrating 65 years of cheerful service that our lodge has given to others. Without the continuous support from people like yourselves Owasippe Lodge 7 would not have the money, time, manpower, and principles to function properly.

We, as a lodge, instituted many programs throughout this past year: computerized membership, an updated lodge handbook, a Where To Go Camping booklet, an upgraded filing system, a chapter visitation program, etc. Most importantly, however, Owasippe Lodge turned towards an increase in youth involvement in running these programs and other activities. This year, 1986, has proved not only to the Lodge staff, but also to others that our Lodge is based on cheerful service and devotion to others. Each one of us, in his own way is "kindling the flame from within".

On behalf of Owasippe Lodge, I would like to wish everyone a very joyous, prosperous, and Happy New Year.

Yours in Brotherhood,

Paul J. Montalbano
Lodge Chief, 1986

"HE WHO SERVES HIS FELLOW MAN, IS HIS FELLOW'S GREATEST"

THE OWASIPPE LEGEND

"The largest Indian mound in this vicinity was built on a high hill above Silver Creek. Because of its size, someone of importance must have been buried there.

An Indian named John Stone frequently visited a Mr. Paul Norman. Both had served in the Civil War, and once he did John a favor, which is something an Indian never forgets. One day he asked John who was buried in the great mound, and John answered that his people had told him it was Chief Owasippe.

The village over which the Chief presided, he said, was on the flat at the foot of the hill. The creek, Bishe-gain-dang (Beautiful), furnished them with fresh water and a safe landing for canoes. Both fishing and hunting were good and the wooded hills that surrounded them kept out the cold winter winds. They were also comparatively safe here from attacks by hostile bands.

Owasippe had two teen-age sons in whom he took great pride. They liked to hunt and fish and sometimes went far down the river to search for game. When, after a reasonable length of time, they failed to return from one of these expeditions, the Chief became anxious. Every day he climbed the high hill and sat for hours beneath a great pine tree scanning the long marsh and watching for their reappearance on one of the many streams that wound through the tall grass to the blue of the distant hill. But no sign of them did he see. No news of their whereabouts could he learn. They might have drowned in the treacherous river or met enemies who had tortured and killed them, which was a common occurrence before 1812. Whatever happened, the two boys were never seen again. Eventually, their father succumbed to uncertainty and disappointment. His people found him dead beneath the great pine and built his mound where he had kept vigil so long.

The boys thought they had found an Indian burial ground hence the name, Burying Ground Point, but from the information given by John Stone, it was evident that these youths were the missing sons of Owasippe. The two boys had apparently pulled their canoes up to the bank for the night, and the river constantly cutting into the earth, had caused it to cave in, burying them while they slept.

Some effort has been made to learn the correct name of the Chief, and its meaning. The Indian language being strick oral, makes the matter difficult. The late K. G. Smith of Lansing and Birch Brook consulted the late Father Gagnieur of Sault St. Marie who thought the name was Awassisihi, meaning 'Beyond the River' hence Owasippe.

When John Stone told this story, the great pine was still standing. In 1914 only a rotted log remained. Now, even that has disappeared. The mounds have settled beyond recognition and would be lost, but for the marker placed there by the Chicago Boy Scouts."

In the early 1890's, three boys were following the trail along the foot of the rollaway at the mouth of Silver Creek when they noticed something that resembled the end of a canoe protruding from the bank. Hurrying back to town, they notified the village marshall, who returned with the boys, bringing men and shovels. They unearthed two dugouts, each containing the skeleton of a teen-age Indian. There were also the metal parts of a flint-lock gun, bits of decayed blankets, a copper kettle and a silver ornament.
